South-West wind (Tempera on canvas 50x70 cm)

The ancient shores of the Caspian Sea, washed by its distinctive dark waters, are the background of this very interesting work of well balanced beauty.

The Harpy, tall and lithe, has travelled among the humans, blending in among them, careful not to attract too much admiration with her striking presence.

She has stopped to rest in mid-air, her elbow on the top of the column marking the west limit of the sea, her eyes turned towards the mountains of her inaccessible home, her thoughts on her sisters she will soon join with a fast flight.

She is fully immersed in the landscape beauty, enjoying the rhythm of the waves, the salty scent of the water, while the moist South-West wind gently blows her curly hair.
